See, the problem with online dating is that you have to write a profile that people actually like. If you don't, you're gonna get a lot of no's. The perfect match is just like food; if you don't want it, nobody else will. If you're willing to put a little time and effort into writing a quality profile, there's a good chance you'll be able to find your perfect match. But I don't have time. A lot of women don't have time to invest into their dating profile. Some can't write for the life of them. Some say they're just not cut out for writing a profile, and that's okay. It's still worth trying. But it's also important to get over the time issue. Whether you're on a matchmaking site or not, make it a priority to stop every 2 minutes or so and spend a few minutes writing down some things about yourself that you'd like to bring up in conversation. It's just a friendly way to ask yourself, "Is this person I'm talking to attractive, interesting, or intelligent?" And if they don't meet your standards, then move on. You have to remember, online dating is not a numbers game. It's not about how many people you get dates with, it's about the quality of your dates. If you write a quality profile, you're probably going to be dating some quality people. 10 Things to Tell your Kids about

Internet Dating If you have kids, it's really important to teach them about internet dating, because it can be a lot of fun for teenagers. Of course, you want to teach them about common sense, but there's also a lot to be learned by seeing how people behave online. I have three kids, and a very interesting story about internet dating comes from them. When I started dating online, my oldest daughter was 15 years old. She was really interested in her first online date, and asked all the questions she needed to. So I figured this would be a good opportunity to educate her about some of the things you can learn about people from dating online. What the kids learned was interesting, and I'm sharing this with you. First, you 4bc0debe42
